TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE MEMORANDUM

#22-01

TO: All Sheriffs and Jail Administrators
FROM: Brandon Wood, Executive Director
REGARDING: Video Relay Service for Deaf Inmates
DATE: January 24, 2022

From time to time, you may have an inmate that is either deaf or has a hearing disability. These inmates most likely use American Sign Language (ASL) as their primary means of communication. In order to accommodate these inmates, the Commission encourages jails to include a provision for Video Relay Service (VRS) in their inmate telephone services contracts or to otherwise give inmate's access to VRS. The service is paid for by the Federal Communication Commission (FCC) under Americans with Disabilities Act. There is no cost to the jails.

According to the FCC, VRS enables persons with hearing disabilities who use American Sign Language to communicate with voice telephone users through a video service rather than through typed text. The inmate contacts a VRS operator by using a computer with a video camera device and a broadband (high speed) Internet connection, or by using a VRS provider's internet site. They communicate with each other in sign language. The VRS operator then places a phone call to the third party whom the inmate wishes to call. The VRS operator relays the conversation back and forth between the inmate using sign language and the third-party using voice. VRS is free to the caller and county jail because they are reimbursed for their costs from the Interstate TRS Fund, which the FCC oversees.

Many jails provide only TTYs for inmates who are deaf in order to access telephone services, which may not be effective. Therefore, other forms of telecommunication technologies such as videophones may be necessary. Public entities, including jails, must give primary consideration to the requests of the individual who is deaf or hard of hearing. Minimum Jail Standards do not require VRS, and it is not part of jail inspections. However, VRS is often viewed as a basic need, and jails should provide it whenever possible.

For more information about FCC and ADA, visit www.fcc.gov/accessibility. Contact your inmate communication services provider to ensure they are providing Video Relay Services for deaf offenders using ASL.
